MEXICAN CONSUL HAS BUSY TIME IN CHICAGO

CONSUL'S WORK NO SOCIAL AFFAIR

By Gladys Perrow

"A Mexican consul in almost any city in the United States or Canada, is at some time or other, father, lawyer, minister, recorder, and defender of Mexicans living there and in trouble," says Senor Adolpho G. Dominquez, vice-consul of Mexico, and now acting consul in Chicago.

Judging from the experiences he told me, this is very true and extremely interesting. The Senor spoke in clear English, with the reserve of a diplomat and the graces of a Mexican gentleman, during the interview, Friday afternoon, May 24.

Life in Mexico

Senor Dominquez came from Mexico City, Mexico, where as a boy he traveled a great deal in the country with his parents. After having been graduated from a 6-year primary school (equivalent to our high school), he entered the University of Mexico City. Special courses offered there such as medicine, law, or engineering, are taken care of by the Mexican government. Many students from the countries of South America study at the School of Medicine, which is regarded as the finest in that part of the world. Senor Dominquez received his B.A. degree from the university, and began to prepare for diplomatic service.

"I liked my work in Mexico City very much," he added. "The climate there is regarded as the finest in the world, having an average temperature of 70 degrees the whole year. The winter mornings are cold, but at noon, one may comfortably go without a coat on the streets."

Senor Dominquez was private secretary to President Obregon in 1922, but took the examinations for his first consul position later. The subjects included a foreign language besides Spanish, stenography, bookkeeping, and archives.

"For promotion," he said, "the examinations were longer and of a more comprehensive nature. I was asked questions on the Mexican Constitution, international law, the civic code, commercial code, universal geography and history, Mexican geography and history, economics, accounting, foreign commerce, and diplomatic treaties."

"Whew!" I whispered to myself. Goes to Canada

Senor Dominquez's first foreign position was in Toronto, Canada. There his troubles began (in language). Evidently English grammar in books is different from that of Canadian and American conversation, for he could understand very little that the people said.

"I would invariably say 'yes' when I meant 'no' or 'no' when I meant 'yes', whenever I was swamped with questions by the people in hotels. One time I heard someone say 'no kidding!' I found that it meant admiration or incredulity. On attending a dinner the next day, some one guest said that his brother had just died. I replied 'no kidding?' and was nearly struck by the enraged guest. Luckily my interpreter, a Scotch boy, set things right for me."

In 1924, when England and Mexico had a diplomatic disagreement, the Mexican consuls in Canada came to the United States and Senor Dominquez with them — to New York. After winning a court case for four falsely accused Mexicans, he was promoted and came to Chicago.

Explains Duties—All of Them

Our protective work as consuls includes aid to Mexicans in court, seeing that jail sentences are just, and that disabled laborers receive compensation, collecting insurance policies, visiting hospitals, and securing work for Mexicans.

"The consul in his commercial work, sees that Mexican merchants have markets for their products, and are informed of changes in price and demand.

"Americans who visit Mexico do not use passports, but tourist cards furnished at the Mexican consulate. Birth and death certificates are sought for at the consulate and even quarrels are brought by the Mexicans to be settled there. Several times Americans have applied for marriage licenses, because divorces are easy to get in Mexico, but they were unsuccessful.

It usually takes 15 or 20 years to be a first consul, but there are vacancies to study the conditions in their own country.

I couldn't let the interview time pass by without asking about the Mexican revolutions, and if the Senor had ever seen one.

To this he replied, "When I was very young, we heard that a gang of bandits were on their way to attack the little town where we were then living. A well 70 feet deep, with stone standing room, was our refuge while the town was looted. If the rebels saw a pretty girl, they carried her off, and shot most of the town's inhabitants. My father had 80,000 pesos with him and managed to keep them, too."

Senor Dominquez recently gave a talk in the state legislature at Springfield, Ill., endorsing a bill to establish the Illinois Mexican Friendship Commission. The bill was passed and the commission is being formed, adding more merits to the credit of this Mexican consul of Chicago, Senor Adolpho Dominquez.

The people who have no work are longing for something to do, while those who have jobs are longing for relief from the everlasting grind.

Now if the splendid speed shown by the boys in running bases, could be manifested when they go down town on errands, happy family life would be promoted.

Driver of Death Car Released Under Bond

Joseph Carr of Chicago, charged with involuntary manslaughter in the death of John Carracci of Chicago, who died when their car left the road and turned turtle at Lake Zurich, was released from the county jail last Monday night on bonds of $7,500. He was represented by Attorney James G. Welch.

The preliminary hearing will be held before Justice Wilfred Hall this week.

Carr denied at the inquest that he knew Carracci had a police record. Carr had been held by Chicago for a drink at the time of the accident and were returning from Avondale to Chicago.

Carr said that he failed to take the turn in the road and he denied that he was driving more than 30 miles an hour.

MARINELLO GUILD REVEALS SECRETS OF BEAUTY CHARM

That subtle charm—that indefinable something that we envy in an attractive woman—what is it? What is there about her appearance that is so distinctly individualistic? It's an hundred to one wager that this secret of charm can be traced to the artistic arrangement of her hair, its lustrous softness, the naturalness of its waves.

Only those who have studied the science of beauty culture can analyze the secret of the becoming coiffure, correctly. The Marinello Guild can tell you in what way this subtle secret of charm may be most effectively adapted to your individuality. The Marinello Guild is a registered Shop, situated at 733 Elm street, Winnetka. Call Winnetka 822 for an appointment. —Adv.
