Motor Touring South to Exceed Previous Records Is Indicated

Although the winter touring season has just begun, there is every indication that the motor trek to southern sections of the country will, like the automobile travel during the past summer, break all records, according to a statement by the touring bureau of the Chicago Motor club.

"Florida, only five or six days' driving from most of the central states, is easily first choice of the winter sojourners," the statement asserted. "The Gulf of Mexico region, including New Orleans and points east, is almost as popular. This section may occupy first place during February, by virtue of the crowds that will attend the New Orleans Mardi Gras, which comes to a climax between February 27 and March 4, inclusive.

"California's attractions lure many, despite the fact that the southern route to that state is the only one open in winter, thus requiring at least a week and usually more for making a one-way trip.

"The other wintering places, such as the southeastern mountains, various hot springs, 'dude' ranches in the southwest and individual points of interest, all have their adherents. The reasons for the vast increase in winter motoring are two-fold. Car owners are becoming increasingly conscious that their conveyance permits easy access to tropical climates within the borders of the United States, and highway departments in the north are now prepared to keep the roads clear of snow."
