CLEANLINESS AIDS IN GUARDING HEALTH

Dirty Skin Unable to Properly Perform Antiseptic Functions, Says Report

Small boys who object to washing behind their ears and washing their hands before meals are not only unsightly but also are seriously endangering their own health, Dr. Andy Hall, state health director, declared yesterday.

Recent experiments in the research laboratories of the state show that the human skin, when kept clean, is a most powerful germicidal mechanism able to disinfect itself by killing disease germs in large quantities, Dr. Hall explained.

In speaking of the results of the experiments, Dr. Hall declared the persons who do not keep their skins clean are inviting unnecessary sickness and disease. He advocated daily baths as routine health measure.

Antiseptic Characteristics
"Never again can live human skin be regarded merely as a protective covering of the body," said Dr. Hall. "Carefully performed experiments done in our research laboratories under the supervision of Dr. Lloyd Arnold, show that clean, live human skin has a powerful germicidal quality of character. Disease germs, and other bacteria too, for that matter, sprayed upon the clean skin of living persons are destroyed with great rapidity.

"Dirty skin is not able to perform its bactericidal function. Fatty substances excreted by the skin can form with dust and dirt a protective layer that saves the germs from destruction. Likewise bacteria that fall upon and under the finger nails escape the disinfecting power of the normal, clean skin.

Virtue of Cleanliness
"These discoveries give new and scientific importance to the virtue of keeping the skin clean. A bath can no longer be regarded merely as an aesthetical habit or action but must now be looked upon also as an essential health protective procedure. Soap and water may remove some bacteria from the skin but they are far more important as a means of removing dirt so that the skin may perform efficiently its function of killing the bacteria which otherwise might attack the body.
