MARKED CHANGES IN INFANTRY USES NOW

Modern Foot Soldier Not Much Like Those of Old Time, Says Report

"Private Terrence Mulvaney was a Lance Corporal once and an infantryman always," as Kipling fans readily will recall. He and his fellow doughboys the world over would be chagrined and saddened were they introduced to the modern infantryman as visualized by the war department.

An infantryman in these experimental, post-war days is as likely to yank a lanyard or tool a caterpillar tank over ploughed ground as he is to muzzle his chin against his rifle butt or brandish a bayonet, says a United Press dispatch from Washington. What the infantryman has come to has been revealed by the war department. If experiments are successful the infantryman of the next war, if any, will be a composite machine-gunner, artilleryman, automatace-rifleman and whatnot, with here and there an individual possessing the familiar rifle, revolver and bayonet.

Experimental Battalion
 After experiments at Fort Benning, Ga., Secretary of War Hurley has authorized organization of the 29th infantry as an experimental battalion, for further investigation of new arms and tactics. The purpose is "to give the maximum striking power and capacity for sustained effort without disproportionate loss of mobility or increase of vulnerability." The war strength infantry battalion to be experimented with will consist of battalion headquarters, battalion headquarters company, three rifle companies, two caliber .30 machine gun companies.

The department said changes in existing organizations had been made, as follows:

Increased Equipment
 Two instead of one automatic rifles per squad in rifle companies.
 Addition of one machine gun platoon, two .37 men, cannon and two .74 mm. mortars to the headquarters company.
 The effect of these changes is to increase battalion strength by 326 to 1,178 men and to increase five power by improvement of weapons. Meantime experiments continue on a semi-automatic rifle to supplant the rifle used during the World war.

Tears Up Cushions But Claims Bad Dreams Cause

John Swenson of Grand Rapids, Mich., who was arrested Tuesday by Police Chief Percy McLaughlin of Deerfield after he had attempted to tear the covering of a seat in a motorbus, was released Wednesday morning after he succeeded in convincing the police that his violence was due to a bad dream and not to insanity.

Cladius M. Huston, new chairman of the Republican national committee, taught a country school in his youth. What better training for the battles of later life?—Boston Transcript.
