HOME OF MONROE
NATIONAL SHRINE

Purchased This Month by Pittsburgh Millionaire for Public Use

On February 1st, 1830, the then county clerk of Albemarle county, Virginia, delivered to E. A. Goodwyn the original deed uttered by James Monroe, fifth president of the United States, to his historic home known as "Ash Lawn."

On February 1, 1930, exactly 100 years later, a similar deed to the property has passed again—but this time from the recent owners of the estate to J. W. Johns, coal operator of Pittsburgh, who has formally announced his purpose of throwing the place open to the public as a shrine for patriotism and thus adding one more landmark to those already available to the people of the United States.

Unusual Feature

An unusual feature of the announcement is that there is no money-raising campaign connected with the acquisition of the landmark. Mr. Johns is authority for the statement that he bought the estate with its historic improvements from the family that has owned it since 1867, in order that it might not, in the course of events, become divided up and obliterated, but would remain intact and take its place with such other landmark establishments as Monticello, home of Thomas Jefferson, close by, and Mount Vernon, home of George Washington on the Potomac. Title has passed and work is now going on to prepare the place for the public.

Since the ownership of President Monroe, the estate has passed through the hands of eight owners. Mr. Johns announces however that it is his intention to restore the premises to the condition it was in when the Monroe family was there and to bring back as completely as possible the spirit of James Monroe himself whose life and letters Mr. and Mrs. Johns have been studying in order to make their work as effective as possible. In this connection they announce that any information or suggestions that can be offered by descendants of James Monroe, or students of his life and activities, will be gratefully accepted.

The home faces that of Thomas Jefferson, friend and mentor of Monroe, and but a short distance away. It was from this place that the author of the Monroe doctrine rode on horseback in 1817 to Washington to take his oath of office as President of the United States. The place has been of note since its inception as one of exceptional beauty because of its boxwood hedges, the fine old trees and the majestic tall Norwegian Pine which Monroe had brought from Europe and which rears itself as a mighty sentinel visible to the traveler for many miles around.

Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, as neighbors, friends and compatriots of Monroe, often visited "Ash Lawn" and there discussed subjects of national and even international importance, even to matters of armament and relationship as between nations much after the fashion of the naval parley now in progress at London.

American Aviation Companies Looking to Export Business

The "far-horizon glance" that fiction and feature writers have attributed to all our best aviators is now a characteristic of the American aviation companies themselves. These companies are looking to other lands not, as was once the case, as the destinations for endurance hops, but as market places for American aviation equipment.

Thus one of our baby industries joins the ranks of old lines and helps to swell the total of American exports. The Asiatic and South American fields offer the best opportunity for the development of this new export item, according to the Nation's Business.

American exports of aviation equipment are not very large today, but the annual rate of increase is so great that one cannot predict what they will amount to in a decade. Automobile exports, which today occupy first place in the export list, had a rather humble beginning. Today American cars are sold in all parts of the globe.

At the present time American companies are third in the list in total value of aviation exports, including planes, engines and accessories. British aviation export sales reached $7,434,700 in 1928. France exceeded that sum while the American total was only $3,664,723. However, the American figure in 1925 was only $783,659.

The significant things about aviation equipment imported by other countries is that much of it is for civilian use, rather than military. The problem in many foreign countries today is mainly one of communication. Communities can wait a week or so for commodities, but they want their mail as soon as possible. Thus countries where the airplane is a far greater rarity than in the United States are turning to it quickly.
