French Aviator Has Devised Plane That Can Hover Like Bird

A young French aviator, who was nearly killed during the war when the motors of his plane suddenly stopped during an air battle, has secretly invented a bird airplane which is propelled by a low powered engine and which can remain in the air with the motor switched off, says a United Press report from Paris.

M. Henri le Maout, the inventor, has completed the preliminary tests of his machine and is so confident of success that he is soon going to give a public demonstration.

While the Spanish airman de Cierva's autogiro utilizes a windmill propeller to sustain it, M. Maout has devised a light, easily manipulated wing which lessens the air resistance and allows the plane to float for a long period without motor power.

Wings Are Small

The wings are very small and underslung, and sensitive to the slightest changes. The plane, because of its lightness and lack of air resistance can be propelled by a four horsepower motor, according to the inventor.

The entire machine does not measure more than 17 feet and is approximately 12 feet in height. The plane weighs only 50 pounds with motor.

The inventor also claims that his bird machine can land on any plot of ground 30 feet square by proper manipulation of the wings which gives it the same landing abilities as a bird. The motor does not carry the plane at a high rate of speed because the inventor has sacrificed weight in order to achieve a machine that would be able to remain in the air through proper use of bird-principle wings.
