Reading Tastes of Men

In studying the reading tastes of men, we may well make note of the books which are reported to have been most read by the men in Byrd's Antarctic expedition.

The Publishers' Weekly for June 14 states that the Harvard Classics and Encyclopedia Britannica came in for hard usage. The history of exploration was a favorite subject.

Detective stories were popular and adventure yarns helped to relieve the tension of waiting for spring. The works of Hansen, Peary, Greeley, Amundsen, Rasmussen, Charcot, Scott Shackleton, Manson, and Gerard were included. In fiction, the most widely read author was Donn Byrne with Joseph Lincoln as a close second. "Messenger Marco Polo" was in such great demand during the early part of the winter that when "Field of Honor" was published last September special copies were dispatched to the expedition's base.

W. H. Hudson's "Green Mansions" was the most read book, probably because of the contrast of its setting to the polar regions. Conrad, Mark Twain and Tarkington were read, but Kipling and Dickens scarcely at all.

The Negro As Hero

Two recent Pulitzer prize awards give point to this list of some of the important books of the past that have dealt with the lives of Negroes in America:

- "Mamba's Daughters" by Du Bose Heyward.
- "Birthright" by T. S. Stripling.
- "Porgy" by Du Bose Heyward.
- "Scarlet Sister Mary" by Julia Peterkin.
- "Green Thursday" by Luia Peterkin.
- "Black April" by Julia Peterkin.
- "Green Pastures" by Bradford & Connelly.
- "Rainbow Round My Shoulder" by H. W. Odum.
- "Ol' Man Adam and His Chillin" by Roard Bradford.

A Favorite

Friday, Aug. 15, was the 75th birthday of Walter Hines Page, publisher and diplomat. In an radio speech, celebrating the occasion, Herbert S. Houston praised Mr. Page's letters. "President Wilson," he said, "a great historian himself, once said to me he was convinced that Walter Page's letters, would live and come to be looked upon as giving the best picture drawn by any one of the English people in the stress and struggles of war."

Children and the Library

"A large part of the social significance of children's work lies in its preparation for a lifetime of happy association with books. All of us would feel that we had failed if a considerable percentage of children do not carry their reading habits over into adult life."—Social Significance of Library Work with Children, by Ralph Munn.

We Read Signs

Since the Public Library moved into the Old City Hall a week ago Tuesday evening 1603 books have been borrowed for home use. The change of location announced at the old library building seems to have kept no one from following it up. The library staff wishes to voice its appreciation of the fine co-operation of its patrons.

European nations do not seem to be enthusing over M. Briard's plan for a United States of Europe. Maybe they are a little doubtful about creating a new Senate.
