SAYS FOOTBALL IS CHARACTER BUILDER

Knute Rockne Tells Rotary Magazine What He Thinks About Athletics

If more public officials had played football, there would be less crookedness in politics.

If statesmen knew as much about end runs and forward passes as they do of secret diplomacy, there would be fewer wars.

That, in general, sums up Knute Rockne's view on politics, city, national, and international. Sportsmanship of the variety learned in line smashes is, he believes, a pretty sensible preventive for most political ailments. In the November "Rotarian Magazine" he tells this story to illustrate his point:

Instance of Sportsmanship

"When Notre Dame met Northwestern at Dyche Stadium, a year ago, one of our men had an injured muscle in his side. The Northwestern trainer came around and offered him the use of a protective appliance — offered it to a player of a rival team! Not only that, but just before the kick-off, the Northwestern man, who was to play against our fellow, came up.

"They tell me you have a sore spot," he said. "Where is it?"

"Our man showed him. Did the Northwestern player take advantage of his information? He did not. Our chap played 45 minutes, and his sore spot was not touched.

Says World Needs It

"That," comments Rockne, "is sportsmanship of the kind the world needs. It means doing your best, and letting the other fellow do the same. It also means taking defeat without humiliation, or victory without gloating.

"A man who can be a gentleman on the football field can be a gentleman anywhere—and what is more to the point, will. If I had my way, I would teach young men of all countries to reach for a football instead of a hand grenade.

"I would like to see international football games. It would do a lot to perpetuate the fine old tradition of sportsmanship among the young fellows of the world—and they're the ones who really count. It would give them lessons in fair dealing and respect for others they wouldn't forget when it comes their turn to run the world's affairs."
