Off to Paint Spring Scenes in Indiana

In order to meet the spring coloring part way, Tom Wilder loaded his family, his paint and canvas into the faithful "Chevie" and migrated to Brown county, Indiana, the week of May first. Object: outing for the family—work for himself. Apple, dogwood, red-bud, lilac and many other favorites were then in full bloom there, and some spring-like sketches characteristic of the quaint country resulted.

Brown county has for many years been the favorite haunt of a number of the Hoosier artists, and artists from other states as well. It is delightfully hilly with abundant small streams flowing through peaceful valleys. Its hundred-year-old log houses and old fashioned ways are also an inspiration to those who seek such subjects.
