★ IT WORKS BOTH WAYS ★

Once in a while we hear someone say, "I get along without a telephone; I seldom need to make a call."

Such a view of the usefulness of the telephone fails to take into account the value of incoming calls. Almost any telephone user can recall instances when a message received has been of the utmost importance—has meant as much as a dozen or a hundred outgoing calls.

The privilege of making calls is only half of your telephone service. The other half is your accessibility to calls from anyone else, anywhere, any time. This feature alone has a value far greater than the moderate amount a telephone would cost you.
