PLANNING SPECIAL INSTRUCTION IN LAW

System Similar to Specialization in Medicine Adopted at Illinois

Specialization in the study of law, similar to the system in medical schools, will be possible at the University of Illinois under a new program explained today by Dean Albert J. Harno.

The law school will retain the present primary courses, though somewhat reduced in class hours in certain subjects, and in addition will give the student who wishes further training in certain fields an opportunity to take additional work advanced and separate course in them.

"For instance," Dean Harno explained, "we have shortened the course in Trusts from four to three hours but the student is given the opportunity to take an advanced course in the subject."

"In the new program the way is left open for the student who wishes to prepare himself only for general practice to avoid the paths of specialization and to choose as comprehensive a program as before," he said.

"The problem of drawing a comprehensive law program to meet the expanding demands of professional training and to fit it into the three-year measure allotted to the professional course of study is one of considerable difficulty. In fact, the measure is running over and we must exert ourselves either to rearrange and concentrate its contents or to substitute a larger one."

"Law schools are meeting problems relative to the training of the oncoming generation similar to those which the medical schools faced with reference to the education of physicians and surgeons some years ago," he continued.

Training Specialists

"We all remember the time when the general practitioner performed various functions from pulling teeth to testing the eyes. The physician who attempts to prescribe for all sorts of human ills no longer exists, or at least he exists not in stabilized communities. Medical schools today are training specialists."

"Along similar lines we have planned and have adopted at the university colleges of law a program which permits a measure of specialization in the study of law," said Dean Harno.

The new program has necessitated adding various new courses to the program of study. Some of these are as follows: Industrial relations public utilities, business organizations, credit transactions, perpetuities and restraints problems in commercial law and banking, problems in criminal law and criminal procedure, corporation organization and finance, taxation, law of oil and gas, landlord and tenant, problems pertaining to rent.
