

America's Banking System Has Stood the Test

During the recent years of world-wide depression, every business, every bank, and every government of the world, has been called upon to meet conditions unparalleled in history.

Leaders in every field of human activity have had to face a withering cross-fire of criticism. Some of this criticism was justified; much of it was not.

During this period of stress, bankers have occupied a position of especial trust and responsibility, and their record of integrity and sound management as a whole, has been a creditable one.

More than 20,000 banks of this country—a considerable majority of the whole number—have staunchly withstood the worst financial storm the world has ever experienced. Could there be more impressive proof of the stability and sound organization of America's system of individual banks?

Let us get facts like these straight in our minds. Let us trust those who have proved themselves trustworthy. The banks of this country are the financial centers around which our renewed business activities must take place.

There is a big job ahead of us. Co-operation will help us to accomplish that job.
