Kilmer's Tree Poem Inspiration for Many Artists, Report Says

Joyce Kilmer's poetic gem to the loveliness of a tree finds many eches in the heart of an artist. In fact it may be said that every one who loves trees is an artist at heart.
Many painters of today, as well as those in the past, have found their fame resting upon the life and spirit in nature as expressed in their landscapes. Rousseau intimately loved the forests. Corot painted their spirit. Constable their grandeur, Inness their moods, and Blakelock their mystery. The Japanese, however, painted their decorative qualities and in this particular field they have yet to be surpassed. There is in Gallery H4, in Hutchinson Wing of the Art Institute of Chicago, a six-fold screen, with a golden background, on which is shown, in one panel a group of trees on the banks of a river. This panel illustrates the exquisite decorative quality which is an essential Japanese characteristic. The two dark, massive tree trunks which rise from the center of the panel are broken by the green leaves and slender branches of similar trees and by the green lichen clinging to their bark. The screen was lent to the Art institute by Tokumatsu Ito. The artist is unknown.

Turn To The Right!

When you follow the Girl Scouts on a woodland trail, you never need to hesitate at a cross-roads, if you know their signs. These girls are telling the next-comers that the proper turn here is right, for the third stone which, on top, would mean "straight ahead" now is right in the direction they are taking.

While he was attending the funeral of one brother in Fremont, Ia., last week, City Judge Theodore For-by, of Zion, was given the information that another brother had died at his home in Deep River, Ia.

The Waukegan contracting firm of Thomsen and Thomsen, 1405 Belvidere street, has been selected as sub-contractors to handle the excavation work for the new federal building in Waukegan, according to announcement coming from the general contractors, Paschen Brothers of Chicago.
