

Should Banks Renew Loans?

Many borrowers, instead of paying or reducing their loans when due, have the habit of asking their banker to renew them.

Sometimes the renewal of a loan is justified. However, the repeated renewal of loans is not good banking policy. It is not the function of commercial banks to grant long-time credits, as the bank must be prepared to pay deposits on demand.

Also, if a few men were permitted to borrow and hold indefinitely the available funds of the bank, the business life of the community would suffer from lack of capital.

The banker does not make the rules to please himself, but to serve and protect his depositors.
