Young suburban matrons, opening this newspaper, will today be arrested by a stunning photograph of a charming Chicagoan, Miss Ruth Seonor, costumed by Marshall Field's Fashion Center.

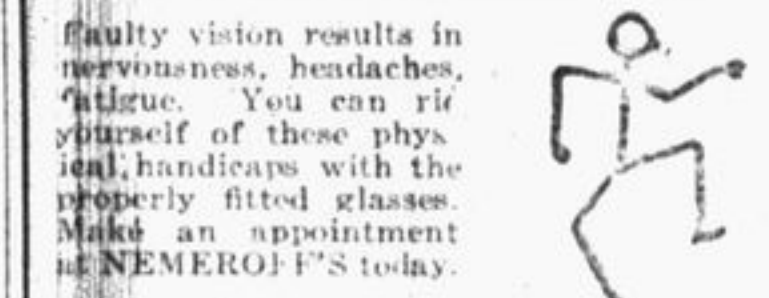

But if they expect the caption to describe the smart clothes worn by this popular young lady, or to record her presence at this or that social event, they will be disappointed. For the photograph is published to draw attention to something far more significant in our busy modern existence. That is, the fact that the women have taken over still another section of man's domain.

Remember when the motor car was strictly a masculine mystery, and all such occult matters as lubrication and carburetor adjustment were supposed to be intelligible only to the gigantic male intellect? Well, all that is past, and to celebrate its passing and the assumption by women of responsibility for the care of the car, the Standard Oil Company is running a series of announcements, like today's, with photographs of some of Chicago's most attractive and fashionable women.

You have only to glance at these young women to know that no grease ever touches their spotless white gloves. For, as usual, women have found a way to save themselves an unpleasant task. As soon as they began to take charge of the family car, the service station, responding to the age-old feminine demand for protection, went through a metamorphosis. It became clean and bright and attractive—a place inviting to women—and the service grew to be actually gallant.

Today, madame leaves absolutely untroubled by the men at the Standard Oil Station. They see that the car is greased when it needs it. They see that it has gasoline and oil and water the radiator. They polish the windows and the windshields, and do a hundred and one little things that she would otherwise have to do for herself. They are quick and expert and courteous, and she appreciates it.
