This Week in Washington

Chicago, Ill., Oct. 12 — Without ceremony or pomp, on Monday (7th) the United States Supreme Court formally opened its sessions in its new judicial home. For the most part the opening day was a disappointment to those who crowded into the courtroom to witness the Justices, with their long black robes, file into their respective places on the bench. After the presentation of a number of motions for the admission of attorneys to practice before the Court, the highest tribunal of the nation recessed until the following Monday. This intervening week has been devoted to judicial conferences in preparation for the cases to be considered at this session.

The United States Supreme Court has made many momentous decisions, profoundly affecting the history of the nation, but I do not believe there has been a case before it than at more deeply concerned about the was ever a time when the people were more keenly interested and the present time. The National Recovery Administration was said to represent the cornerstone of the Deal and since the unanimous decision in the famous Schechter Poultry Case, which meant an end to the Blue Eagle, the United States Supreme Court has been the subject of lively discussion in virtually every household of the nation.

Since the NRA decision there have been proposals to amend the Constitution so as to make the New Deal legislation consistent with it and there have been proposals to abrogate the power of the Court. Some would have the requirement that all decisions to be effective must be unanimous. Others would increase the number of Justices. Only recently, last Monday in fact, Gov. Harold G. Hoffman, of New Jersey, proposed that the Constitution be amended to require that all laws be submitted to the Supreme Court for a decision as to their constitutionality before they become effective, claiming that such an amendment would prevent invalid "legislative or executive experimentation." But, on the other hand, there are those who challenge the right of the Supreme Court to declare any legislation unconstitutional. Several such challenges were made on the floor of the House during the last session of Congress, particularly when the question was raised during the debates as to the constitutionality of a pending bill.

Such questions as these are, in the last analysis, for the people themselves to decide. Should any such proposals for changing the character, composition, power or procedure of the Supreme Court be formally presented to the electorate one cannot but hope that the fire of personal interests and the smoke of politics will not be permitted to becloud the issues. The people's decision will be as important as any made at the Constitutional Convention, when this government was originally formed.

The underlying principle of our democracy is that all authority originates with the people, that "the government is the agent of the people" and acts upon the power delegated to it by the people. The Constitution represents the people's grant of certain powers. It sets forth not only what Federal Government can do but also what it cannot do. It is the supreme law of the land, expressing the rights of the Government and the rights of an individual.

In order to maintain an equilibrium between the rights of the Government, delegated to it by the people, and the rights of an individual, the Supreme Court of the United States was established. It has been said to be the "lone defender of the people's rights against the encroachments of the Government." It determines when the Government has exceeded the limitations placed upon it by the people.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall pass no law denying the people freedom of press, of speech and peaceful assemblage. For illustrative purposes, let us assume that Congress passes a bill, and it is signed by the President, which provides that hereafter nothing may be published without the approval of the Federal Government or that no meetings of more than 500 persons can be held without the approval of the President. Such an act would obviously be contrary to the Constitution, but who is there to protect the people's rights in that matter unless it is the United States Supreme Court. It is an exaggerated example, to be sure, but it serves to indicate the importance of the tribunal which is now meeting in Washington to consider cases arising out of legislation enacted by the legislative and executive branches of the Government. An abridgment of the people's rights is often hidden in the most innocent and well-intended legislative act. Somehow such abridgments must be prevented by orderly processes of government or a democracy cannot long survive.

It appears that a great many difficulties are being experienced by the Works Progress Administration under Harry L. Hopkins in reaching its announced goal to transfer 3,500,000 persons from the relief rolls by November 1st. The work-relief program last week was 2,023,766 jobs short of its goal. I understand that all the funds have been allotted but the unemployed are not being absorbed. To help

Musical, October 23 in Deerfield Church

A musical program will be presented on Wednesday evening, Oct. 23 at 8 o'clock at the Deerfield Presbyterian Church, sponsored by Dorcas Circle Two.
 A varied program is being arranged with instrumental and vocal numbers and readings.
 Julian Strip of Waukegan, who attends Lake Forest College, will be the guest soloist. Edgeley Todd and David Stryker, both local boys attending Lake Forest College, will present a repertoire of two piano music.

Miss Betsey Hill of Barrington will give a group of readings. Miss Hill has been studying dramatic art with Bessie Williams Boynton of the Bliss School of Music and Dramatic Art in Oak Park and expects to have classes of her own in the near future.
 A small admission charge will be made and the public is cordially invited to attend.

 A humanitarian service. Guard the priceless gift of good eyesight.
 Laundries, bakeries and dairies call for light colors because they provide the necessary even distribution of light and the easy detection of unclean conditions.
 Owners of large office buildings are becoming more and more conscious of the way illumination can be increased by reflection and of the saving of their tenant's eyesight. Tenants will be easier to attract and hold in homes and apartments as a result of the brighter quarters they have to offer.
