This Week in Washington
By Ralph E. Church
Representative, 10th Congressional District
Chicago, Illinois, Aug. 8.—There is probably no federal bureau better known to the general public than the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice. With the enlargement of the scope of its work and the powers of its special agents in the detection and apprehension of crime, the Bureau of Investigation at Washington has been likened to England's famous Scotland Yard. While our national criminal investigative agency has not had the years of experience, in many respects it is considered superior to Scotland Yard.
The term "G-Men" has become the popular characterization of the federal agents. Their effective war against organized crime is the subject for many motion picture scenarios and is the theme of several daily comic strips in our newspapers. To be a cowboy, policeman or fireman are not the only boyhood ambitions. Many youngsters are telling their fathers that when they grow up they want to be "G-Men."
Hardly a month passes but that I receive one or two letters from some young man in the district who is interested in becoming a special agent. Director J. Edgar Hoover has advised me that he has several thousand applications on file of qualified men who are anxious to enter the service.
The fundamental requirement is that the applicant be either an attorney at law or an accountant. He must then pass a rigorous mental and physical examination. His prospects for appointment are in part dependent upon the rating received in these examinations. He must also meet the requirements as to character, experience and natural aptitude. Courage, honesty and self-discipline are an important as mental ability and formal college training in the law or accountancy. Together they form the foundation for the extremely technical training the new recruit receives when he enters the service of the Bureau of Investigation.

The new special agent is given at least eight solid weeks of schooling in the art of criminal investigation. In the crime laboratory he is taught tests for bloodstains, identifications of handwritings, the science of ballistics, and the many other technicalities which often lead to the apprehension of the criminal. He is taught how to ask questions and how to interrogate a suspect. He must learn to observe and remember every detail.
Department of Justice training in criminal investigation is based on the premise that it is more important to pursue men. This probably accounts for the fact that the conviction record of the Bureau of Investigation approximates 95 per cent. That is to say, out of every hundred cases brought to trial only five would result in an acquittal.
In 1932 Congress passed the original Federal Kidnaping Statute, and within approximately a year the Bureau of Investigation participated in the investigation of 32 cases. All of them were promptly solved. It is reported that as a result of work of the federal agents in such cases kidnappings are decreasing in number.
Active participation in a criminal investigation by the federal agents themselves is a small part of the work carried on by the bureau. Law enforcement bodies everywhere—sheriffs, constables, police departments and state police—avail themselves of its many services. Evidence is daily sent to the federal laboratory for study by experts and a report to some local law enforcement agency. The federal bureau is gradually coming to be recognized as the central working agency against crime in the United States. Its importance has increased with the development of fast transportation, whereby a criminal can move swiftly from one state to another.

We can well take pride in the efficiency of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Quick apprehension of the criminal is a recognized deterrent to crime. Important as the development of a strong law enforcement system is—local, state and federal—we should not lose sight of the fact that first emphasis for a solution of the crime problem should be on the conditions which tend to breed crime.
