A Who's Who for Highland Park

Everyone likes to be proud of his home town—particularly if the town is small enough so that the individual has not been immersed in the seething impersonality of an urban community.

Mr. Average Citizen swells with pardonable pride upon contemplating the new flagpole, boasts of the town's population growth, applauds the crime detection record established by the local constabulary, and cheers wildly and unrestrainedly for his home team in the big game with a rival town.

Community pride is a fine thing. It is closely akin to love of home. It welds a group together, and spurs its members to greater things, individually and collectively, for the advancement of the whole group.

Highland Park is a community of which to be justly proud. In the days of its early development people were attracted here by the beauty of its topography—its ravines and trees. As the city has grown, its civic and cultural development has been such that its people may be increasingly proud of the place where they have made their homes.

But there is even further cause for gratification that our people as a whole are no doubt unaware of. It is not generally realized that the calibre of the individuals who make up this community is unusually high. Highland Park numbers among its citizens leaders in their fields of national repute. Still larger is the number of those who are outstanding in the Chicago area. The various lines of business, letters, the arts, and professions are represented brilliantly among the citizens of Highland Park.

It would be a community building force of great effect if an agency or medium were set up whereby the people of Highland Park could be introduced to each other. This is not meant in the social sense but rather in the informational. Our people should be made aware of the achievements of their neighbors.

If this were done there is little doubt that people would realize even more clearly than they do now that Highland Park is a good place in which to live.

Oldsmobile Shows Two Distinctive Styles in Cars

The 1937 Oldsmobile, two new, distinctive and entirely different automobiles, are now being shown by the Nelson Motor Sales of Highland Park.

Mr. H. R. Nelson in an interview stated: "Oldsmobile again sets the pace in 1937. Not only are both the six and eight different from anything else on the road, but they are entirely different from each other and again set the styles for the coming year."

"The design advance is but one of the many improvements. The cars are bigger in every way, with longer wheelbase, bigger engines and roomier bodies. Many new safety features have been added. Comfort has been increased in a dozen ways. Economy of operation has been gained by improvements in carburetion and slower engine speeds."
