Today's Driving Hint

(Prepared by the Safety & Traffic Engineering Department of the Chicago Motor Club)

There was an excuse for the legendary farmer who came to the city hotel and blew out the gas light; there is none for the motorist who runs his car in a closed garage.

Illuminating gas is not more deadly than carbon monoxide.

Automobiles have been in common use for more than a quarter of a century, and yet, every year a long list of names is added to the roster of motorists who failed to open garage doors when starting their engines.

Every winter the newspapers publish stories of deaths from this lethal gas, proving that even today there is justification for issuing the annual warning.

Make a practice of opening garage doors before getting into the car.

Probably you can warm your car quicker in cold weather by keeping the doors closed, but you won't live so long.

Remember, you can't see carbon monoxide gas and you can't smell it. It hits you before you know what happened.
