Corrective Gym Classes Offered At H. P. High School

In order to remedy the poor posture that is quite noticeable among the Highland Park high school, classes in corrective gymnastics are offered in which 95 per cent of the students improve enough within one year or less to be dismissed.

On the basis of a physical examination given each student entering the Highland Park high school, doctors recommend for corrective gym work students whose posture is noticeably poorer than that of the average student. The few students who resent having to take corrective work, usually become very much interested in it, especially after they notice their first improvement.

The class work consists of strengthening the muscles that hold the body erect, stretching the opposing muscle groups, and arousing the interest of the student in improving his posture by pointing out the advantages of good posture.

The types of poor posture dealt with are over-curvature of the upper back, commonly termed round shoulders; over-curvature of the lower back, commonly called sway-back; over-curvature of the neck, which throws the head too far forward; lateral curvature of the spine; and foot cases that cause trouble and pain.

Improvement is checked, by silhouettes on the Schematograph at the end of each six weeks' period and the sending of questionnaires to the parents, asking whether they have noticed any improvement.

The parents write very enthusiastically about the results achieved.
