

Chats with the Master Gardeners

1. PLAN GARDEN EARLY

Probably the most important step in making a garden is planning it. Of course, people who garden in a hit-or-miss way sometimes come out all right, but it's been my experience that sound planning pays real dividends in extra beauty. One friend of mine—a man who's famous in his community for the wonderful effects he gets in just a small space—told me he always knows exactly what he's going to do with every square foot of his garden before he turns the first forkful of earth.

If I were you, the first thing I'd do in planning a garden would be to make a map of it on a big sheet of paper. And I'd make it pretty carefully to scale, so as not to overlook any space that could contribute to the beauty of my garden. On this map I'd locate the permanent things, such as trees, shrubbery, and the house. If you have a pool or a rock garden, put them into the map too. Then, around these, plan the sizes and shapes of the flower beds.

Seed Catalogs Helpful

One of the best ways I know to get gardening ideas is to read seed catalogs. They'll not only give you a wonderful selection of flowers and plants to choose from, but they'll give you a very good idea as to which are best suited for the climate you live in, which will grow best in your kind of soil, when you should plant each variety, and when you can expect one to blossom. When I read seed catalogs I keep a list of the flowers and other plants that appeal to me. And I'm always careful to include some new flowers that I haven't grown before. I've found that one of the most delightful experiences in gardening is in finding new faces in my flower beds each year. It's just like making new friends!

When you've decided on the flowers you're going to grow, the next thing to do is to plot on that map of yours where you're going to put each variety and how much space you can budget for each. There are a number of things to keep in mind. Some flowers grow a lot taller than others, and the shorter ones have to be out in front where they can be seen. And since flowers don't all blossom at the same season, each flower bed should be planned so that it will have a pleasing variety of flowers in bloom at all times through the summer. Color combinations have to be considered, too.

Feeding Most Important

Here's an important thing to remember about your soil. Your growing things depend on it to supply them eleven different food elements, every one of which is essential for healthy growth. From time to time these food elements become exhausted from the soil and have to be replaced... because growing plants, just like growing children, can't be strong and healthy without a complete balanced diet. To avoid all risk, I feed my garden a complete plant food—one that I can be sure will supply all eleven of the needed food elements in scientifically balanced proportions. It pays to give everything you grow a square meal.
