10 Lesson Course In Economics Opens At "Y" Next Monday

A 10-lesson course in fundamental economics and social philosophy, under the auspices of the Henry George School of Social Science, opened Monday evening, April 15 at 8 o'clock in the Highland Park Y.W.C.A., 374 Laurel avenue. It will continue once a week for 10 weeks.

Henry P. T. Tideman, Lake Forest, is the instructor. In his leadership of the class, Mr. Tideman will follow the discussion method throughout without requiring written work nor examinations.

"This is a laboratory course in economics," he said, "in which basic economic principles are tested in relation to current problems." The course is offered without tuition fee or other charge, the school being sustained by the donated services of its instructors and the voluntary contributions of its alumni. "The reason the teachers of these classes give their services without financial remuneration," Mr. Tideman explained, "is because they believe that there can be no satisfactory ultimate solution of our economic and social problems without a more widespread study and re-study of economic principles.

"The teachers of the Henry George school already feel rewarded," he added, "in the fact that over 30,000 men and women have enrolled in these classes since the school was chartered by the University of the State of New York in 1932. Extension classes are conducted in over 100 cities of the United States and in as many more cities of other countries throughout the world. Over 40 classes are meeting in Chicago and suburbs this spring. In New York City the school now occupies a five-story building being equipped to accommodate 6,000 students a term."

The textbook of the course, "Progress and Poverty" by Henry George, has been acclaimed by such leaders as Nicholas Murray Butler, Newton D. Baker, Louis D. Brandeis, Albert Einstein and Clarence

Darrow. Those who enroll may bring their own copies of the textbook or purchase them at class for one dollar.
