Morning in the Land

I liked this book, and I want to tell you why.

I liked Morning in the Land because it is so pleasantly different from the kind of book that I have been receiving and reviewing lately. It has a pleasing lilt to it, a buoyancy that keeps one interested. Then, too, it is so charmingly simple, and by that I mean it has precision and forcefulness presented in an unobtrusive manner. When you read Morning in the Land, you realize that each sentence has been worked over with the skill of a poet, and Miss North is a poet, there is no doubt of that.

There is "no smell of ink" in Morning in the Land. This, I believe, is another commendable thing about the book. Each picturesque scene, indeed, each picturesque thought has a touching humaneness about it. Miss North seems to have an insight into the vague and rather incomprehensible naturalness of the human animal. This discernment stands faithfully by Miss North throughout her new novel.

Lastly, I liked Morning in the Land because it tells a story that moves neither to slowly nor to rapidly but, instead, at a normal, intelligible degree of swiftness.

In essence the story is this: The Wentworth family, consisting of Thomas, Ann, and their two sons, moved to Wisconsin. (Originally they had lived in Derbyshire, England.) The story of their lives is told. The focus, however, is upon the life of Dick, the younger of the two sons. Unmistakably it is weaved around Dick Wentworth and the many adventures that he experienced. There is real warmth in this novel, a warmth that seems to radiate from the characters portrayed so clearly in Morning in the Land. I shall not tell any more of the story. I shall let it remain a pleasant secret for you to discover.

Pointed, yet at the same time sympathetic. Human, yet in no way sordid. An interesting, well-told tale, deserving of praise, and with a sincere hope that Miss North will continue to turn out such delightfully entertaining novels, I close this review.
