Private Jackson Gets Out of Bed to Music!

The Army has had its "canned music" for some time now, but it experienced its first "canned sergeant" at Fort Sheridan this week.

Pvt. Wright D. Jackson, who in civilian life lived at 228 E. Huron Street, Chicago, Illinois, is a willing soldier, but he never, wants to get up in the morning. Realizing that he was causing his sergeant a great deal of extra time and effort, he hit upon an ingenious plan which would enable the sergeant to awaken him and go about his other early morning duties at the same time.

Pvt. Jackson made a recording of his own voice, with the assistance of the nearby Salvation Army USO, and set it on a phonograph next to his bunk. Now all the sergeant has to do to awaken Jackson is turn the phonograph on, and Pvt. Jackson begins telling himself what a beautiful morning it is at Fort Sheridan. He promises himself pancakes for breakfast. He points out that he has an obligation to the other men in the barracks in that he has to help them mop the quarters. And finally he ends up with a lusty shout, "Jackson! Get outa bed!"

Pvt. Jackson no longer has any trouble getting up in the morning.
