A Horne-booke is a necessarie toole." (Year 1612)

With the approach of a new school year and our thoughts turned to books, paper, pencils and ink, it seems rather interesting to contemplate the scanty educational tols used ticularly the Hornbook.

The Hornbook was the earliest school book made for children to be handled by themselves. The most commnly used, was made of a pice of wood cut in the shape of a paddle with a handle convenient for holding in the hand. On one of the sides was placed the lesson sheet and over it was laid a piece of transparent horn held in place by metal strips tacked to the wood. Quite often a hole was bored through the handle and a string through it, so it could be carried, hung around the neck, or suspended from the wrist or belt.

Sometimes, however, one could also find hornbooks of ivory and silver, of leather r finely carved wod.

The lesson-sheet, made from vellum or parchment, and later on of paper was handwritten. Usually it began with a cross followed perhaps by the alphabet in small and capital letters, the vowels and the syllables, the Exorcism and the Lord's Prayer.

Occasionally the lesson-sheet would be surroounded by an ornamental, decorative border.

Down through the centuries the various kinds of Hornbooks taught the children their letters until the de-Assistant Refuge Managers must velopment of paper and the invention on reasonable be college graduates who have had 2 of printing made it possible to give terms.
