

DEEPS and SHALLOWS

HOME MAINTENANCE DEPARTMENT

Dear I.B.: What can you tell us about having a small farm with a cow? My husband is employed in the Loop, but he is fond of unpasteurized milk, and I am a writer, and would enjoy the peace and leisure of rural surroundings.

Dear A.M.: In order to have unpasteurized milk the year around, you need not own a cow but two, since they sometimes go dry. Having two cows, you sometimes have too much milk, so you get a pig to use up the surplus. Having a pig, you raise corn, but then you might as well have chickens to feed the kernels to. You will have too many eggs, so you will sell them and be known as the "Egg Woman."

Your husband will work harder and longer in the Loop to support all the animals, but at the end of his long ride home he may not be too tired to discuss farm problems with you.

The calves (by-product of unpasteurized milk) are cute and appealing, and will make you think you might want to write again some day, if you can remember where you stored the typewriter. I.B.

THE BARRED SEVEN

Chapter Ten

Roger agreed to wait in the living room. Mirthbone and Reddigan withdrew also, murmuring sotto voce, leaving George and me in our favorite corner of the library. But the cozy intimacy of the room had vanished. The aroma of Reddigan's cigar and the glaring useless floor were reminders, if one could ever forget what happened there.

"Oh George, I've been so worried about you!"

"Tell me first about the murder, all you saw, and what you picked up from the police. I may know who the murdered man—"

Hilda was in the room. Without her clattering long handled dust pan, we had not heard her come in.

"I have to dust in here," she announced grimly.

Disappointed as I was, I acquiesced from habit. "You won't disturb us, Hilda."

"No, I won't disturb you."

George ordered her out. As she lingered stubbornly, dusting near the door, he roared, "Really out!" She flounced through the door, and before I could gather my thoughts to begin, she had turned on the electric mixer in the kitchen with a bowl too small for the beater, so that when the blades struck the sides with a clatter that resounded throughout the house. It was her favorite device to express displeasure; she had used it before, during those rare broadcasts by Toscanini of the shimmering Lohengrin Prelude.

I tried to reconstruct everything for George. I described the body; I told about the clean hearth after I had left the ashes of a fire, and what we had found in the chute; I told, as softly as I could against the noise, how queer Roger had acted; and I repeated Mirthbone's opinion about the murder weapon. I hated to tell him all my anxiety about him, and the evidence that he had been home on the night of the murder. I wished that he would tell me of his own accord.

"You're not mixed up in all this, are you?"

He caught his breath and hesitated. "If I told you anything, I'd have to tell you a lot more than I dare give out right now—"

"But if you think you know who the murdered man is—I think that would help Mirthbone to figure out—"

He shook his head slowly and said so that I could hardly hear, "You'll just have to trust me a while longer, Angela," and from his pocket showed me the "Strictly Confidential" on the cover of his work papers. I knew there was a case pressing him to tell. His very presence always gave me confidence in him, and already I felt as comforted as though I really knew all I wanted to know.

"I'm so glad you told me that—" I was going to finish "that muck," when I stopped, because I realized that I was shouting, and the electric mixer had suddenly stopped.

In the doorway stood Roger and Gertrude Jason. No telling how long they had been there, unable to make themselves heard.

"Oh Ger," I said, rushing up to them, "you heard what happened while I was at your party!"

"You poor lambs, is there anything I can do?"

George answered gravely, "I wish you'd stay here tonight, and you too, Roger. I can't be here myself. I'll ask for police guards, but they'll be downstairs, and Hilda's way off over the garage. There may be no danger, but I wish you'd both be here."

"Sure, we'll stay, won't we, Roger?" Gertrude seemed thrilled.

"I've got to go to the office," Roger said, "but I'll be back. Yes, I'll stay tonight."

The policemen joined us. "So it was your party Mrs. Misty went to," Reddigan said. "Was she there all the evening?"

"Either Angela, or a reasonable facsimile thereof," Gertrude answered. "She could have been a statue. If I'd known she was so tired—But Roger! Where did you disappear to, half the evening? Did you get stewed?"

Roger blushed. "I—I took a nap. I didn't feel like drinking, and you know, when everyone else has had a few drinks, nothing they say sounds funny, and I was tired, so I just slipped off upstairs."

"Anybody see you up there sleeping?" Reddigan pounced on him. Roger shook his head. "I guess not." (To be continued) I. B.

Since the days of National Defense, we've been salvaging certain old equipment for later use: if necessary. In the year just passed, for example, we recovered 422 tons of copper from worn-out telephone cable. And this is just one of the many examples of the way we plan ahead to give you good telephone service.

Our program of salvage and re-equipment of existing facilities last year enabled us to give service to some 75,000 new subscribers who otherwise would have been without telephones. You can depend on telephone men and women to make the most of what they have to give you the best service possible—and that means the world's best.
