The Dinner (An Impression)

Candles, a glow of color on gleaming linen. Hushed voices, laughter and the tinkle of silver.

Quite Boring

Potpourri of "Pops"

Without infringing upon the categories of the classics or the semi-classics, or lingering in the realm of jazz and "boogie," I should like to mention a few love songs which I feel hold real charm.

Remember that little number a full generation before the bobby-sox era, that fox-trotted over the country and breezed across the blue Atlantic to become a favorite of the late King of England?

Artless as a barefoot boy was that little thing that startled its writers by climbing right up on the shoulders of their more ambitious efforts and riding along with the Hit Parade.

And speaking of dreams — the tragedy of broken ones ranks high among themes for song. The oldie, "These Foolish Things," is a masterpiece of its kind, justly held up as a mark for aspiring "pop" writers to shoot at.

"The winds of March that make my heart a dancer . . . A telephone that rings — but who's to answer? Oh, how the ghost of you clings! These Foolish Things remind me of you."

Quite as revealing under its mask of sophistication came another much later, "Thanks For The Memory." Strictly on the modern side, gallant, unrecriminating, the originality of its song pattern, the smartness of its lines, made it a winner.

And for one who likes imagery in one's lyrics, how about that old smoothie, "It's June in January"? "Crystal pure as a mountain spring is that little number of Sigmund Rhombert's, "When I Grow Too Old To Dream," which needs no comment.

Then there's the little honey, "Stay As Sweet As You Are," and much along the same line, as appealing as a wild rose, the song to top them all, Jerome Kern's "The Way You Look Tonight."

How does it go? "Darling . . . never, never change; Keep that breathless charm — Won't you please arrange it? For I love you

Just The Way You Look Tonight." Irving Berlin's "I Threw a Kiss In the Ocean," sung a few times at the beginning of World War II, didn't seem to catch on, and too bad, for it has something.

Perhaps that lump in the throat it invokes kept it from becoming popular. More successful, later on, was that poignant little thing, "I'll Be Seeing You," with its theme, "I'll be seeing you in all the old familiar places," and ending: "I'll see you in the morning sun, and when the day is done, I'll be looking at the moon — but I'll Be Seeing You."

There are hundreds of others, but these really ring the bell with me. What do you think?
