Jazz Versus Pop

All this happy stuff about popular songs is O.K. In fact, I endorse the selections mentioned, with the exception of "When My Dream Boat Comes Home."...

Now jazz is different. A good jazz record is interesting the first hearing, fascinating the second, and by the tenth it's a part of my life.

Jazz can tire me out with its flood of power, but it never becomes tiresome with repetition, as does almost any pop tune.

Ed's note:

There are certain combinations that click—and that's all there is to it. Like salt and pepper, sandwiches and pickles, youth and jazz.

True enough the Hit Parade is not for the intelligentsia. Personally, though, I'd never "snoot" a chance to be represented thereon.

The Greater Wisdom

Kids out-sharp us grownups: they can tell How loud to holler down an empty well, The day the ice is hard enough to cross.

Grownups tell time by roundfaced, ticking clocks, And know which keys to fit in stubborn locks;

That ghosts don't stalk lone travelers at night, But I say kids are smarter. Am I right?

Well, Wasn't She?

In regard to last week's "Pot-pourri of Pops"—we must say it irks us no end to hear her majesty, the queen mother, referred to as "his wife."

Pfc. Kenneth Tether With "Ghost Patrol"

Pfc. Kenneth Tether, son of Mr. and Mrs. John Tether, 145 S. Green Bay, is now stationed with the 15th Cavalry Reconnaissance squadron in Germany. A recent letter makes it possible to piece together some of his experiences.

In March, 1944, Pfc. Kenneth left this country for overseas, arriving in France, from England, the following July 4th. He was in Cherbourg with the 3rd army at the beginning of the Brittany campaign, and at that time he was given a grandstand seat in the foremost jeep that led the northern spearhead. It was in this campaign that he was taken prisoner, and remained a German prisoner of war from September 13 to September 21, when he was released by allied forces.

After the fall of Brest, his unit, now a part of the 9th army, went through northern France, Belgium and Holland. When the 2nd armored division started on its dash to the Elbe river, Kenneth's unit accompanied them as a "Ghost Patrol," getting back of enemy lines, destroying communications and supplies. Later he was among 13 from his unit selected as a sentry guard for Gen. Simpson, from whom he has received a personal commendation for his services.

Participating in four of the five campaigns since D-Day, Kenneth wears four battle stars for the campaigns of Normandy, northern France, Rhineland and Germany.

In civilian life a musician, Kenneth has had an eye on the great organs in the European cathedrals, although G.I.'s are not allowed to try them out. He corresponds with several friends made while he was stationed in France and Holland.

It was during his service in the "Ghost Patrol" that the young G.I. had his greatest adventures. An infantry colonel has called these men the "tough guys of the war," and also "the loneliest men in the army." Operating behind enemy lines, surrounded by enemy guns—sometimes on foot and sometimes in vehicles—these men carry out rugged assignments. They are the eyes and ears of their outfit. Speed, teamwork and fast, straight shooting are their bywords. They strike and vanish. The insignia on their helmets means "always ready," and their basic job is to get information about the enemy and keep the enemy from getting information about their own forces.

At one time the Germans announced that the "Ghosts," whom they termed a "crack armored division sent behind enemy lines on suicide missions," had been wiped out. And by all rules of logic, they should have been, for their vehicles were light and small and no match for the Nazi "big stuff." But rules don't count at times like these, for when the "Ghosts" have used up all the old tricks they invent new ones. In spite of less than half a chance to get out alive, they get vital information somehow, and shoot it back to HQ via courier or radio.

At the time the Germans were retreating before Patton's onslaught, the "Ghosts," who had been in and out of so many traps that they could smell them, got caught in a very tough spot. The Germans were retreating so fast that the "Ghosts," who were behind their lines as usual, were in danger of being run down.

One unit found itself surrounded by the enemy and cut off from its main force. There was but one hope—the wild scheme of racing through a German bivouac area.

Assembling their vehicles, they moved in. Gas pedals pressed against the floor, MG's blazing from both sides, they thundered through the amazed Germans who had supposed them to be 20 miles away. As an added insult, one driver slowed down, a G.I. reached out and yanked a surprised German, in the midst of shaving, into the jeep, and away they dashed, the unit reaching safety without a casualty or the loss of a single jeep.

This is but one example of the brilliant coups accomplished by the amazing G.I. "Ghosts."

Kenneth is 21 years of age, and joined the service in March, 1943. Much of the ground on which he has fought was covered by his father while in the British army in World War I.
