

Deep and Shallows

Flowery Pitfalls

A hungry fox, in search of food,
And in an avaricious mood,
Espied a crow, about to eat
A tempting bit of tasty meat.
He brightened instantaneously,
And murmured softly "That's for me!"

Taking a stance beneath the tree,
He gazed aloft admiringly,
And registering artless bliss,
Gave out a line somewhat like this:
"I've heard you singing in the dale—

A rival of the nightingale!
Pray favor with your song most sweet,
And thus make my whole day complete."

Susceptible to words like those,
The crow struck a self-conscious pose;
He gazed demurely down his beak,
And simpered coyly, so to speak.
The fox gave out with honeyed words
Like: "Sing, most beautiful of birds!"

Intent upon the tasty prize,
He clasped his paws and rolled his eyes.

The crow, unable to resist
Such praise, which hitherto he'd missed,
Released the muscles of his jaw
To utter a most raucous "Caw!"

Then peering down to earth, to sense
His spell upon his audience,
He almost toppled off his seat—
The fox was gone—so was the meat!

Sweet flattery, though rather nice,
Ofttimes exacts too high a price.

—HIGHLAND LASSIE.

Expectation

I don't know what I thought to find—
But I know this:
I thought 'twould be another kind—
Your kiss.

No, I'm not disappointed, dear;
Expecting bliss
I simply got what was, I fear . . .
Another kiss!

—A.W.M.

Empty Paths

Whenever I see an empty path
I cannot bear to pass it by,
It looks so sorrowful, there alone,
Awaiting amblers such as I.

Each time I meet their secret gaze
I gaze in answer, pausing, too;
I always mean to pass them by,
But somehow, strangely, never do.

Sometimes I find a leafy nook,
Sometimes a swing tied to a tree,
And once I found a little stream,
Gurgling alone in childlike glee.

These tiny paths that cross our lives,
These sidetracks from important ways,
When followed, may give quiet joy
To be recalled on sadder days.

—A.C.C.

I Betcha!

Around the block, and in and out,
And here and there, and round about . . .
A line for nylon hose, no doubt!
