Self-Discipline

I discipline myself this way —
I do two things I hate, each day....
I rise, at morn, with eyes like lead,
And then, at night, I go to bed.

At the Races in California

Comfortably seated in the Grand Stand, I am waiting for the races to begin. What an attractive place it is. The scenery is enchanting. Before us is a beautiful lake, with a small waterfall and dozens of white ducks and geese passing and re-passing in different formation. There are some white swans and even some black ones. What a picture they make. But I mustn't forget the Goose Girl in her colorful clothes, who steps into the scenery ever so often.

The track is as smooth as sprinkler and scraper can make it. From where we sit it looks like satin. People are swarming in and the seats are filling up. What different kind of a crowd. There are young and old, —more men than women. The majority are interested in their programs. Some have other printed matter they are reading. Men alone are figuring on the margins of their programs. Groups of three and more are arguing about something, one trying to convince the others, some people talking constantly and others listening. Every so often they jot down something they have been listening to.

Here and there one sees a flashily dressed dame, with much costume jewelry and a freakish hat, fur boa and white kid gloves. Of course she is stared at and that is what she wants. Most of the women wear smart tailored gowns and dark glasses.

The atmosphere is one of expectancy. Of course every one hopes his special horse will come in FIRST, THIS TIME.

The trumpeter appears and the clear notes of his call are very welcome. Now for the first race.

The exhibition, on display during the month of November, is a collection of work in water color, oils and lithographs done by the Ox Bow group, who studied during the summer in and around Saugatuck, under the direction of Francis Chapin, of Chicago.
