Library Adds New Books On Creative Writing

Creative writing, whether it be poetry, drama, the novel or some other form of literature, is one of the most important forms of self-expression known to man, and for you Highland Parkers who aspire to make a name for yourself in this field of endeavor the Library has several new books which should help you attain your goal.

Short-story writing today can be an art, a craft or a business, according to Kenneth Payson Kempton, author of "The Short Story," which was added recently to the Library's collection. However, Mr. Kempton, who evidently practices what he preaches as he is the author of more than 200 successful and popular short stories, maintains that short-story writing need not necessarily be just one, but can, and should, be a composite of the three. Anyone who wants to write will find in "The Short Story" an illuminating discussion of techniques as well as a number of actual illustrations of these techniques.

For those who are interested in writing children's books or stories Erik Berry and Herbert Best's "Writing for Children" should prove helpful as well as immensely entertaining. This book, though written in a somewhat humorous vein, is really a common-sense analysis of how to plan and how to write for children. The book covers a wide scope and ends with valuable hints about marketing the finished product, always an important bridge to be crossed by every writer.

A new field of writing which has just recently come into its own, but in which there are still unlimited opportunities for success, is radio writing. Erik Barnouw's "Handbook of Radio Writing" is a "must" for anyone interested in entering the field. The many problems and limitations which confront the radio writer, but with which other writers are not concerned, are pointed out by Mr. Barnouw, who, however, does not stop here, but goes on to explain how these difficulties may be overcome. A whole section of the book is devoted to the types of writing that are in demand by broadcast sponsors and
