Interesting Books Added To Library

A number of new, interesting and unusual books placed on the shelves of the Highland Park Library during the past week now await your inspection and approval.

An unusual book entitled 'Faces of Destiny' contains seventy-five pictures by Youssif Karsh, one of the foremost portrait photographers in the world. The portraits, selected from the studies of outstanding persons which have established his reputation, include those of men and women from nearly every nation on the globe. Winston Churchill, King George VI, Princess Elizabeth, Madame Chiang Kai Shek, President Truman, General Charles De Gaulle—these are just a few of those represented. Short biographical notes on each of these notables are included in the book, while the intimate anecdotal comments by Karsh himself are interesting as sidelights on the personalities of his subjects.

Of special interest to readers in this area because it is a biography of a Chicago woman is Olivia Howard Dunbar's 'A House in Chicago'. It is the story of Harriet Moody who did more perhaps than any other person to foster the great flowering of literature in the Midwest during the years of the early twentieth century. Such men as Vachel Lindsay and Carl Sandburg, John Masefield and Rabindranath Tagore were drawn to 2970 Groveland avenue, where, in the friendship of this remarkably gifted woman, they came to know one another and, in several cases, discovered their own talents.

'End of a Berlin Diary' is William L. Shirer's contribution to the group of post-war books dealing with the factors which were involved in the cause of World War II and the possibility of preventing a re-occurrence of these factors.

Those of you who have enjoyed his broadcasts and his first book, 'Berlin Diary' will be interested to read his views on the prevention of aggressive tyranny and the possibility of permanent world peace and order.

The author of the popular 'Screw-tape Letters' is back in the limelight again, and this time it's a volume entitled 'Miracles'. C. S. Lewis treats this subject in a slightly unusual manner. With most historians the decision against the probability of miracles is made almost unconsciously before the historical work begins. The purpose, however, of this book is to shift the question of probability from unconscious to the conscious plane, and its main argument is directed to embattling the 18th and 19th century assumption against the miraculous.

Lucius Beebe's latest book, 'Mixed Train Daily', is now among the Library's recent additions. This volume is not concerned with main-line railroading, whose operations have already been recorded in Mr. Beebe's previous books, but rather with the little railroads whose stories are not so well known, but who have, nevertheless, played a definite part in the building of our country. Augmenting the story are numerous photographs by the eminent photographer Charles M. Clegg, Jr.

Shortage of magazine storage space for ammunition now on hand has led the Ordnance Department to develop a process of burying bombs 'alive' to preserve them.

This project, still in the experimental stage, but giving every promise of being completely successful, can result in substantial savings. It will eliminate the need for new magazine construction and it will reduce surveillance costs to a minimum. At present, bombs are stored in igloo magazines and in outdoor barricaded sites. There are now too few magazines, and the outdoor site exposes bombs to weathering.

About 250 gross tons of bombs are being buried alive in each 'grave' at the Savannah Ordnance Depot in northwestern Illinois. Bomb parts and shipping bands are taken off and stored elsewhere, leaving only the bomb body, a metal container filled with TNT. The nose and tail fuse cavities are filled with preservatives. Bandages and grease cover threaded sections. Finally, the entire bomb is thoroughly coated with a special type of preservative.

Each pile of bombs is covered with earth to a minimum depth of three feet at the center and tapered to the sides to give drainage. After the earth has settled, it is covered with blacktop.

Add to time savers: keep two or three spreads in refrigerator for the lunch box line. Combine grated yellow cheese and pimiento with real mayonnaise. Or blend liver-wurst with vitaminized margarine and add a bit of chopped pickle. And remember that real mayonnaise jars make excellent containers for these spreads.

Save old tooth brushes to clean your costume jewelry. And when there's no polish for that silver pin or those earrings, call on a bit of toothpaste to do the shining.

If you're lengthening dresses — and who isn't these days — when ever sufficient, drop half the hem's length, then stitches will fall on the original crease.

Beefsteak shortage is predicted for at least the next two years. Although slaughtering of cattle is up 50% of prewar, herds are up only 20%.

Something different in the pot holder department is mittens made from cotton quilting, lined with unbleached muslin. Two pairs can be made from one-fourth yard. Colorful tape makes an attractive finish.
