Nero the Leek Eater

Last year, our readers may recall, we dipped into herb history and came up with some odd ones in "The Herb Garden". This year we decided to do a somewhat similar story on garden vegetables. So we headed for our library chair to collect more bits of plant lore, legend and superstition. We found that Nero was given an uncomplimentary—but fitting—nickname because of his munching on a certain vegetable. The ancients believed that the very air was peopled with fairies, goblins, and things that go bump in the night. They felt that they had to be on guard against these enemies and diseases with charms and precautions from the plant world. Lovers wore certain vegetables for good luck. We learned the sad meaning of the phrase "she hath given him turnips" and the pretty custom "Peasod Wooing". These and our other findings we call "The Kitchen Garden".
