End Of A Perfect Friendship

Mattie and Sarah were long-time friends, but as different in temperament as in appearance. Mattie was short, stout and brunette, while Sarah was tall, slender and blond. Telling a little white lie didn't prick Mattie's conscience, but an untruth of any kind was an abomination to Sarah.

Mattie was always the last to leave after a meeting, the last to say goodbye to the minister after Sunday service. She was always forgetting something. This day, she had forgotten to get something for dessert, and suddenly she grabbed Sarah's arm. "Let's stop at the bakery so I can get something for my sweet tooth husband's dessert."

At the bakery they found a huge pan of fresh gingerbread. Each bought a square.

Several days later when Sarah came out of the bank she saw Mattie and her husband on the opposite corner. She crossed over, but before she could offer a single word, Mattie's husband began, petulantly: "The next time you send me a piece of your gingerbread, Sarah, please see to it that there is no indelible lead in it," and turning to Mattie, he added: "Stop kicking my shins. I want Sarah to know what a time I had getting that indelible lead off my teeth. It wasn't funny, and my whole mouth was purple."

From Mattie's scarlet face, Sarah realized that she had told another of her little white lies. Turning to the irate husband, Sarah said:

"Fred, I never baked gingerbread in my life. Mattie bought that which you ate at the bakery—I was with her when she bought it. I'm sorry for your unpleasant experience. But as for the gingerbread—that is just another of her little white lies. I hope she can straighten it out with you—she never can with me."

And bidding them goodbye, Sarah walked away.
