

called before the Law Society, if he has not been summoned already.

"Now," continued the Premier, "I must say something more—and I say it with sincere sorrow. Emissaries of these parties succeeded in securing the assistance of a newspaper man, and a newspaper in this city published a story that the Cabinet had quarreled over the measure and the Lieutenant-Governor had refused to sign it. Of Sir Mortimer Clark, let me here say he proved as worthy of his high office as was her Majesty Queen Victoria herself of the throne. Subsequently the reporter confessed that there was no foundation for the vile statements in the paper. I expect on a future occasion to say more in reference to this matter. I refrain to-day.

"Now," concluded the Premier, warmly, "let the penny-a-liners and grub-stake pamphleteers who labor under the wing of the Toronto Electric Light Company do their worst. They are using an organization styled as the Economics Society to send out their literature. Only the other day one of their leaders declared, 'We are not through with those fellows in the park yet.' Well, later on I anticipate that I shall have something further to say. It is fair that the people should know these things. Meantime we shall go on aiming to do right and deal honestly and fairly with all, realizing that there are obligations and responsibilities in the confidence which the people have so bountifully given us. We trust the people and the people trust us." (Government applause.)

Mr. MacKay's resolution was declared lost on division.
