

Tips for turning off your heating system for the new season

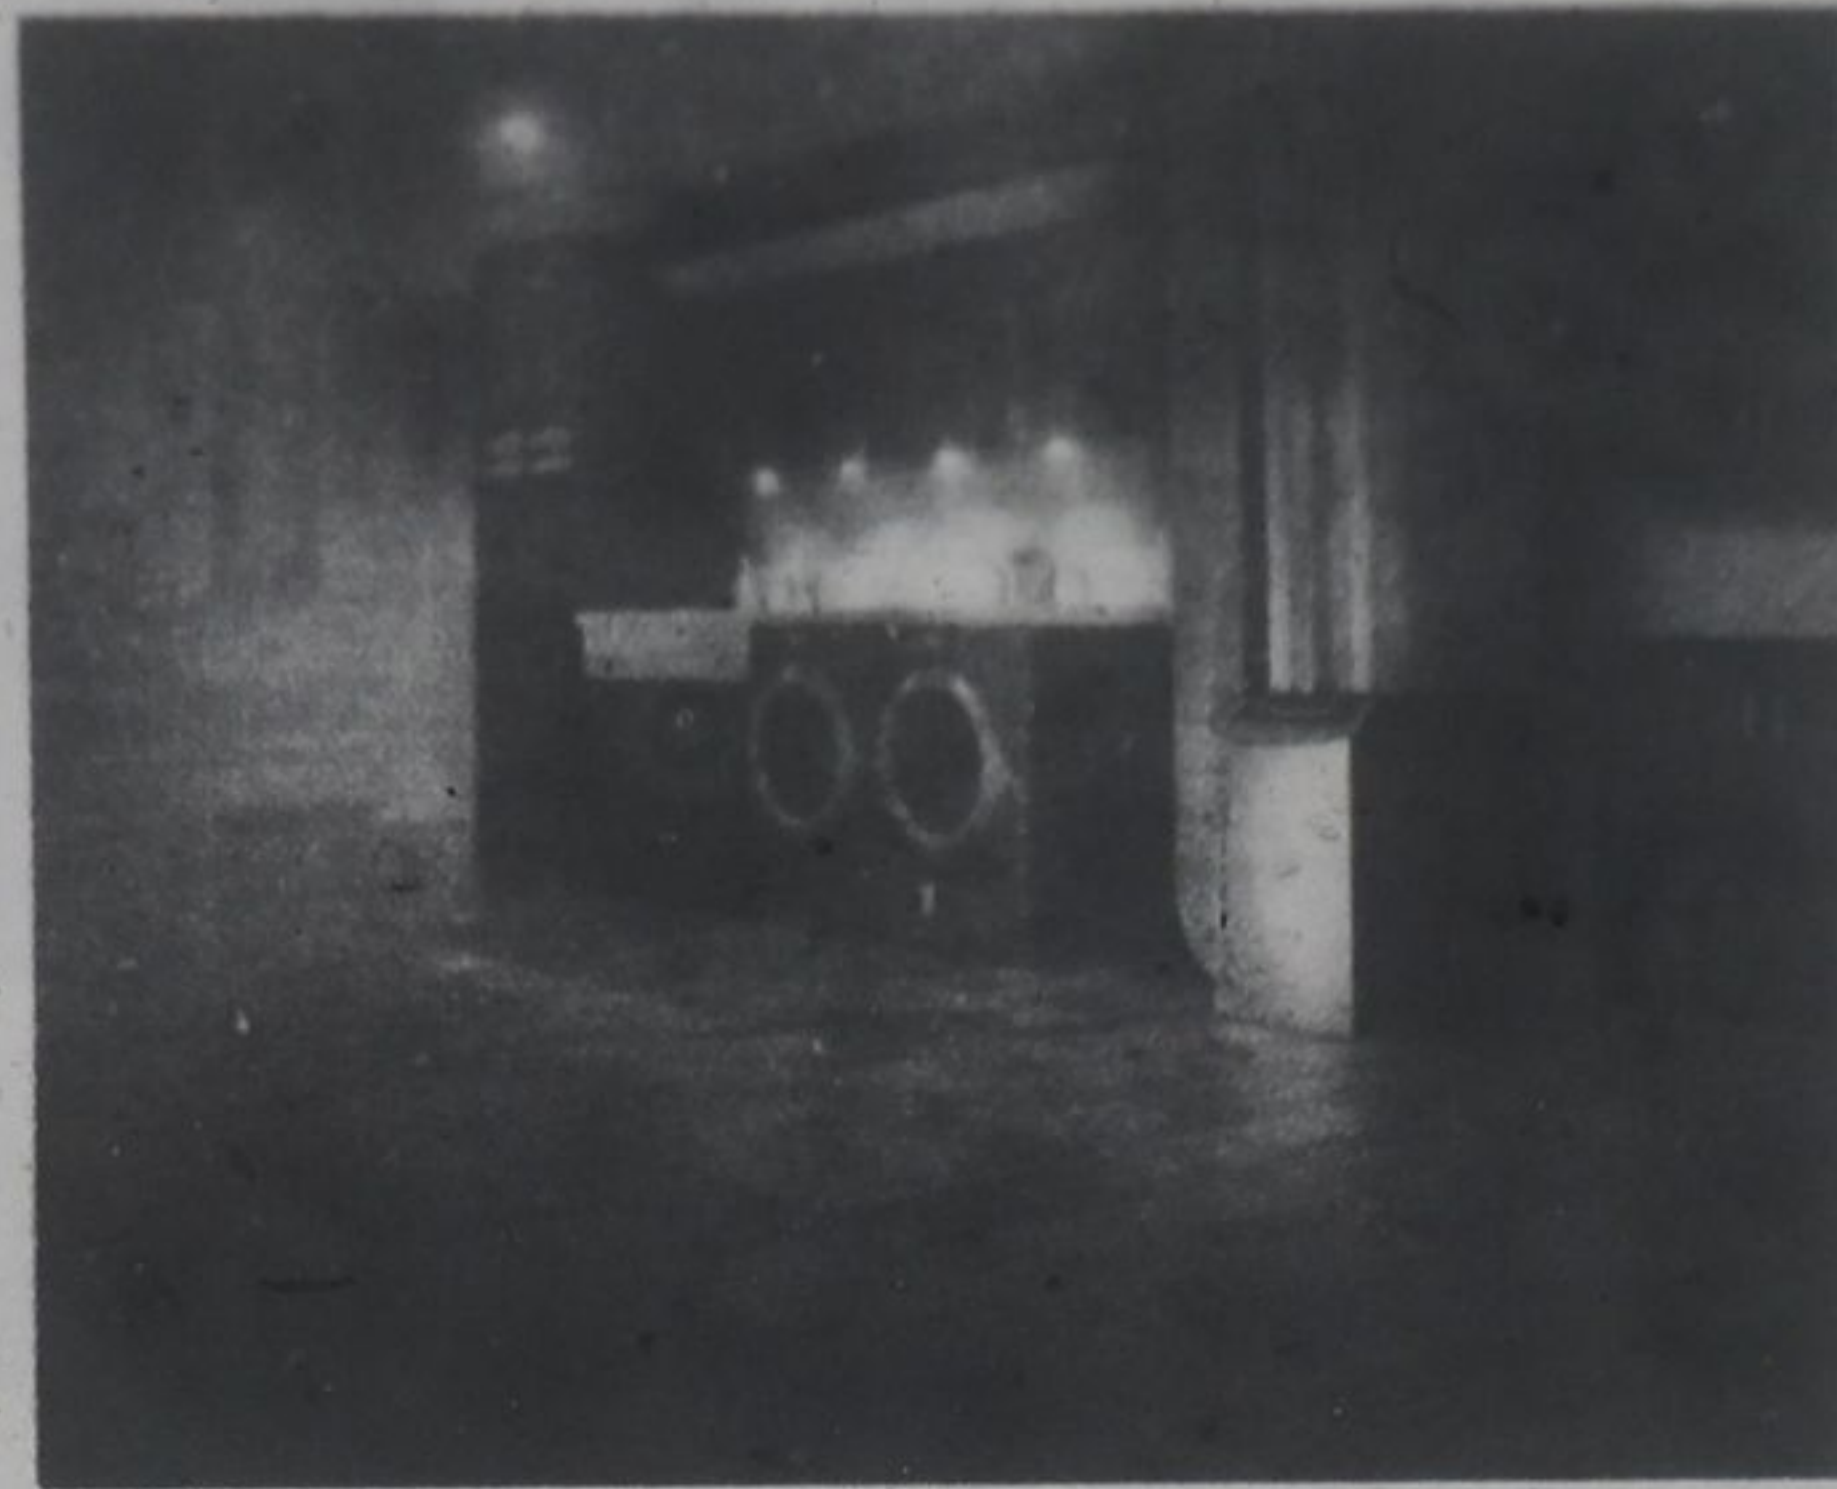

Scrubbing your house from top to bottom may be at the top of the list, however it is important to include caring for your furnace as part of your chores. Cleaning your HVAC system as it adapts to seasonal change is crucial, and entails everything from cleaning filters to administering repairs both outside and indoors.

Here are helpful tips provided by experts at Napoleon for shutting down your furnace and cranking up the A/C for the new season:

- Lower the thermostat in your home to a minimum temperature and allow it to complete its current heating cycle. Once this cycle ends, turn off the power switch on the furnace to permit proper shutdown. For a gas furnace, turn the furnace valve clockwise to complete this process.

- Clean filters in your furnace to allow open airflow through the ventilation system. Avoiding this step could lead to performance problems when your furnace is re-activated for the winter.

- Ensure air conditioning units are in proper condition ahead of time. Check the condenser unit outside of your home for damage or debris, and clean coils so heat is properly transferred outdoors.

- Check to see if condenser fins on your unit are straight and free of bends. Condenser fins on your unit can become warped due to forceful weather, natural debris or careless maintenance.

- Change the filter on your air conditioning system and vents throughout your home. Doing so will help remove unwanted debris and increase the lifecycle of your unit.
