POETRY.

Written for the Champion. Great God of nature whose right hand

Directs your planetory spheres, How long shall erring mortals stand Who pour their oaths into thine ears Shall feeble man, Great Thee, despise Whom Heaven and Earth and Hell obey, Who hold'st the keys of Paradise, And wipes whole Governments away.

The fierce tornado from the West, Lists to the echo of thy wand. And sleeps where'er thou bid'st her rest, Obedient to thy high command.

The raging tempest direful breathes His wasting fury o'er the deep. But ah, thy mandate Nept; ne sheaths The storm, and tempest, and thy sleep. Sear dormant nature gladly springs, And clothes the meads with grass again,

Thy word, the vernal charmer brings, And gems with sparkling blooms the plain. But man above, whose giftful soul Commingling passions eyer warm, Defiance bids to Heaven's controve,

And raises high his puny arm. He views the diamond vault of Heaven. And notes the starry fingered God, He sees the trembling forest riven, By angry lightenings at thy word.

And in deep nature's mystic lore.

That schools the world from age to age, He marks the vastness of thy store, And reads thy name on every page.

Must die and wither at a blast. How long, if Heaven propitious smile, Shall thou her golden precepts scorn, Her merciful decrees revile,

Would learn and know the Great I Am,

Nor deem thou must to dust return. God in his plentitude of grace, while extends our little span. But all must meet him face to face,
