he says it very sweeth. " Prisoner," said the Judge. " you have heard what has passed. Can you say any of the verses ?"

Thus adjured, Power recited the second verse of that sweetest or all Moore's melodies with great taste and expression. The witness listened with delight, and at the end exclaimed "I was sure of it. Nobody ever said " all but me departed but himself." He had said so, and her evidence was irresistible.

The waiter at the Western Club, the clerk at the coach office, and the guard of the mail, all spoke of his having been in Glasgow on Monday until four o'clock, and having left it by the coach that evening. He arrived in Edinburgh, as the Crown witness had said at nine that night. The chain was complete, and all idea of concert was excluded by the fact that none of the witnesses knew when they came into Court the reason of their being STATIONERY summoned. The case looked like one of mistaken identity; but the remarkable thingswas that the accused had never denied that he was the student in question, and seemed from the first to be familiar with all around

The Crown had no choice but to abandon the prosecution, and the prisoner was acquitted; but the mystery which the trial had thrown over the whole affair created an unpleasant impression, and he left Edinburg the

In his alarm, he immediately started off by the coach which left for Glasgow at six o'clock, to meet his brother, and consult what was to be done. The coach stopped at a stage post where it met the other, and there the brothers resolved on the romantic course of changing their identity-Power going to London as Reynolds, and Reynolds going to Edinburgh as Power. The rest is easily conceived. BULDERS but Reynolds remained Power to the end of his life, and would never hear tate.
