country. After spending some time in travelling through Germany and Italy, he finally located in Belgrave Square, London, where, in 1843, he made a sort of political debut, receiving, with all the formal etiquette of courts, the homage of the few ardent legitimists who followed his fortunes. in 1853 an arrangement was made for consolidating the interests of the elder and younger branches of the Bourbon family, but it was never carried into effect, and we doubt whether it ever will be. In. 1846 the Count de Chambord married the Princess Maria Theresa, eldest daughter of the Duke of Modena, but no children have been born of this union.
