thoughtfully remarks:

Even to the satisfaction of the spirit of the deceased ox we presume. supposing that it had a spirit and that its spirit was present at the process of roasting its mortal remains. It is not unimportant to know that the roasting was well done, because, after a speech, and, had the cookery been bad, it might have had an injurious that properly roasted ox bears to political sentiments. But to make the effect more plain a comparison was needed, and that, too, was furnished! in the evening of the same day, when, according to the report from which we have already quoted: roast ox, their appetite was not so keen. perhaps, as it otherwise would have been.

The fact that an overplus of roast ox diminished the consumption of tea. coffee and cake, may possibly affect the value of the comparison between the courses of diet; yet they were sufficiently distinct to furnish grounds for comment and enable us to judge the respective effects of ox and tea on a man's political tendencies. The test was not as complete a one as could be desired, and possibly the result will not stand a rigid scientific scruting; yet, in so far as we! can judge from the experiment it may be laid down that roast ox is more conducive to political virtue than teal and cake. After bartaking of the of strong reform leadings, and see ned almost disposed to go the "whole ox" for Mackenzie's Government. At all events he went so far as to repeat that if Mr. Mackenzie's Government administered the affairs of the countr with ability and justice, and brought forward good measures, it should have from him a generous support.

Indeed, with his brain supplied and (refreshed by ox. Mr Chisholm went so far as to declare that: Whatever other party distinctions there might be, there was always the broad distinction between the party of right and the party of wrong He hoped they would always find him with the party of right. We would be disposed to ask no stronger pledge from any man thanthat he would always be found with the party of right, so that we may legitimately come to the conclusion that an ox roasted whole, in a proper way, is tavorable to public virtue. and should be encouraged as an article of fond.

We very much fear that the same cannot be said of tea and cake, for in the evening, after having subjected s his brain material to their operation. Mr. Chisholm tell from grace in the most deplorable manner. The ox influence so far controlled him still that he did not withdraw his promise to support Mr. Mackenzie, but the tea and cake induced him to express an almost equal willingness to support Sir John Macdonald. Those articles of food dre'v from Mr. Chisholm the truthful remark that "his political history had been a short, but in t a ! bright one"-a statement which no one in the audience appears to have disputed.
