Married Love.

Marriage is too frequently the end, nstead of the beginning of love. All the reams of courtship vanish too often nto thin air soon after the wedding ring is put on. The realization of that perfect and unalloyed happiness decided feeling that the sweet courtesies and gallantries of wooing time are out of place after marriage; it often nappens that each treats the other ith an indifference that ends in muual repulsion, aversion and contempt

Is there no preventative for this? Is there no balm in wedlock for these terrible evils? During courtship enstrangement seldom occurs. Each is so thoughtful and careful to please th ther that "all go merry as a marriage bell," and the young lovers dwell in perpetual sunshine. Why cannot this the marriage relation without?
