The Two Typewriters.

A good story is told of a certain New York publisher, which has not been widely circulated. It is sufficient for present pur poses of description to say that he is a goodlooking bachelor and possessed of much humor, though it is often concealed beneath a certain gravity of manner. His large correspondence necessitates the employment of four typewriters, who are women, as is usual with typewriters nowadays. Two of these are sedate, decorous, and middle-aged: two young, curly-haired, and prone to can dy and conversation. It happened one day that the two last mentioned being alone in the outer office fell into converse instead of
