FLIGHT OF BIRDS.

There has been some difference in the conclusions of observers as to the relative height above the earth and more especially as to relative velocity of movement in the semiannual flight, north or south, of some of our migratory birds. Judging from all that the velocity of some of these far travelers has been exaggerated. Careful measurements by means of the cloud theodolites used by the observers at the meteorological station at Blue Hill in Milton, a few miles south of Boston, have shown ing wild geese were at an elevation of 960 was 47 8 miles an hour. These velocities story: ducks have been credited, for these swift birds have been said to fly at a rate exceeding 100 miles an hour. That ducks do at times, exceed the rate noted by the Blue Hill observers seems very probable, but it is by no means certain that they ever fly at such a velocity as 100.8 miles an hour, as some observers have asserted. Just what velocity would be requisite in a duck striking the heavy. projecting glass of a lighthouse to drive his bill down his throat may be a difficult roblem, but the fact itself has been noted, in the case of at least a number of one flock of ducks that had been flying southward on their autumnal migration, and were picked up at the foot of the lighthouse tower on Anastasia island, near St. Augustine, Fla. Sweeping on in the darkness of a cloudy night, the ducks had followed the increasing beam from the light and dashed down upon the thick but clear glass wall with the effect above mentioned. Very likely a velocity of 60 miles an hour would suffice to drive a duck's bill down its throat, and it may be a diestion whether the ducks ever really fly at a much greater velocity than 60 to 70 miles
