Beredity of Heterogeneous Populations.

The extreme fluidity of our beterogeneous population is impressed upon us by every phenomenon of social life here in America. We imagine the people of Eu generations of stable habitation to have tentedly into place. This is an entirely erroneous assumption. As a matter of fact they are almost as mobile as our own American types. There are two ways in which demographic crystallization may have taken place-a people may have become rigid horizontally, divided int castes or social strata, or it may be gen graphically segregated into localized con the isolated hamlet to the highly individualized nation. Both of these forms of crystallization are breaking down today under the pressure of modern industrial-

America. Nor is it true that the recency of our American social life has made the phenomena of change more marked here than abroad. In fact, with the relics of the old regime on every hand the present tendencies in Europe are the more startling of the two by reason of the immediate contrast. - Professor William Z. Ripley
