the number of casual crimes, such as murder, infanticide, embezzlement. arson and forgery. Without doubt thousands of people standing well in the world's opinion, have been, at one time or another, saved from the commission of some great crime, by fear of rake. the gallows, or of long imprisonment. But if they could have looked ferward wagon. to an early parole, and subsequent pardon, procurable by a pretence o repentance, they might not have hesi. tated to take the chance. A bank teller with an opportunity for embezzlement or safe robbery; a lawyer, hard pressed, but with money obtainable by forgery; a revengeful! man suffering under real or fancied wrong; a wife with an unloved husband, a convenient box of poison, and a great longing to be free!-These are all combinations easily productive of crime, and there is little doubt that if the punishment of such crimes were made less certain and terrible, the number of offenders would greatly in.

In instances like these the indeter. minate sentence should not be allowed to operate, Such criminals must be made a public example of, and their sentences should seldom be shortened.

Eighteen Election Petitions to be Tried.

The indications from the conference held at Osgoode Hall yesterday morn. ing regarding the trial of the host of election petitions seem to be that at least two thirds of the 62 on file will never come to trial. The proceedings took place in the Court of Appeal room, and the Judges present were Mr. Justice Osler of the Court of Appeal, Mr. Justice Rose and Mr. Justice Ferguson. A batch of four solicitors representing each party was also present :- Messrs. W. D. McPherson, Edmund Bristol, John Kerr, Jas. Peddie, F. McCallum, James Baird and D. W. Saunders, for John Smith, A. Cook, John Featherston the Conservatives; Messrs. R. A. Grant, John Ford, L. Huffman, John Beattie C. J. Holman, George Ross and H. E. Mr. Lawrence, John Husband. Irwin, for the Liberals.

In all, applications for the trial of only fifteen straight petitions were pu' in, seven against Liberals, and eight against Conservatives, also three cross petitions against defeated Liberal candidates.
