the rosy young Englishman received the greatest honor of his life by being made for the moment an American and a senator. -- New York Times.

INSTINCTIVE REASONING

Professor Witmer Gave His Audience an Example of It. Professor Lightner Witmer of the University of Pennsylvania was a participator in a symposium on "Reason Versus Instinct" before the Contemporary club. His address was mainly devoted to exemplifying the faculty of instinct in the lowsupport of his views. The professor is a ner is serious, not to say solemn. At one period of his discourse he made a longer pause than usual, and then, with addigan the relation of a story. He told how he had walked out one evening with a young lady-his sweetheart, phrase described the peace and beauty of the evening and the sympathy of mutual happiness and love that each experience in the society of the other. In this strain the professor continued for quite a time. There was absolute silence in the room. The men looked at the speaker quizzically, as much as to say: "Jove! Man's got merous, kept their gaze fixed on him with on, "we sat down to rest on the trunk of a fallen tree, and my dear love climbed up on my knee and establishing herself securely in my lap put her little arms around my neck and, drawing down my head until her sweet face rested against mine, said"- The professor paused and glanced slowly from the auditors on his right to those on his left. There was general expectancy among them all now. The men looked puzzled and the women sat open mouthed and intent. "Her sweet face rested against mine, said, 'Uncle, is the moon really made of green cheese?" " The audience for a moment was astonished into absolute rigidity by this unlooked for denouement and then broke into merry laughter as they began to comprehend how the professor had played on them. "That," he went on, "was a story told me by a certain professor, and I think you will now understand what is meant by instinctive reasoning." - Philadelphia Color Hearing. Color hearing is well understood by psychologists as a state in which colors are associated with given sounds. One of the most marked conditions of this sort is mentioned in the case of a patient who was suffering with brain fever. Whenever the door of the sickroom was opened, the entire apartment seemed flooded with yellow light. A heavily loaded wagon passing along the street produced the color of blue flame and the peculiar metallic iridescent tints one sees on steel in the sunshine. Certain voices seem to bring a ruby or garnet shade before the vision, and so on through a considerably extended list of sounds that were likely to occur about the house. In normal states very beautiful shades of gold, purple and red tints have been noted. A sudden noise as the falling of any object often produces a sudden rush of color before the eyes.

onds. - New York Ledger. Clothing Needed by Tourists. Robert Luce writes in "Going Abroad:" "Every self respecting man and woman ciety wants at all times to be neatly dressed, but it is universally understood that the exigencies of travel do not permit the variety and elegance of costume custom ary and practicable at home. Indeed good taste does not justify the display of elaborate gowns and millinery on steamers, in cars and at the tables of hotels frequented by transient guests. The plainest garb therefore is permissible in traveling, and as a European tour very seldom takes one is both needless and foolish to cumber oneself with a variety of wearing apparel.

The poet Tennyson's sympathy with animals is shown by a wee story told in his "Memoir." A beautiful setter was given him. At midnight it suddenly struck him that the new dog might feel hungry and lonely, so he went down stairs and stole a chicken for "Dear Old Don." Great was the consternation in the kitchen next morning as to what had become of the chicken.
