Autumn in the Grande Ronde. In the yellow haze of autumn When the Great Sun God looks down Perping o'er the purple mountains, On the irland valley town. Peeping on the town and valley, On the rich, ripe harvest yield On the stores of ruddy apples, And the emerald beet field,

() the broad, wide plain that stretches To the mountrins' buttressed base; Where the autograph of glaciers Once was written on their face. To the great snow cap that glistens, With the myriad sunbeams' light; Melting into mountain torrents, Quivering, bursting with their might, Leaping through the rock-ribbed gorges, Hurling like a wild stampede; When the Terror strikes the cattle, And the Terror gives them speed. Matching with the wind that rushes,

From the foamy crested wave. But the valley warm and smiling, Though the mountain air be chill; And the heart in quickened pulses Feels a st mulating thrill. Oh the joy that autumn brings us, When the summer's work is done; And the fruitful breast of Nature. Has been quickened by the sun. When the soft gray clouds are floating

On the mountain's purple crest;

And the voice o' Nature calling

All her children home to rest.

From the canyon's icy cave;

Toving with the spray that splashes
