Had the number of men on the farm been equal to the task, there s little doubt but that the tractor would still be considered mainly as luxury to be possessed only by hose who had made good on the farm, and not by those who are using it as a means of making good. The fact of his always being "behind with the work" has driven many man to buy a tractor in order to feel for once in the last five years that he has caught up with the work, and can have an hour to discuss with his neighbor the latest information relative to farm or city conditions. Many men have procured tractors exclusively for the belt work which they are able to do with it. These, combining their own work with some custom work, have made the tractor a paying proposition.
