would be his if he rose to battle further. All the argument seemed on one side. But high and bright above all this burned the indomitable flame of his spirit. To rise, to fight, to struggle on. Never to yield until the Power' Blove decreed! To stand firm, even! as the pines themselves. The dommant greatness that Linda had found in this man rose in him, and he set his muscles like fron. He shook off the mists of the frost in his brain. Quickly he knelt by Lindn and shook her shoulders in his hands. She opened her eyes. "Get up, Linda," he said gently. "We have to go on." She started to object, but a message in his eyes kept her from it. His own spirit went into her. He helped her to her feet. "Help me roll the blankets," he commanded, "and take out enough food for breakfast. We can't stop to eat it here. I think we're in sight of the main trail; whether we can find it-in the snow-I don't know. We must get farther into the thickets before we stop to eat." They were strange figures in the snow flurries as they went to work to roll the blankets into a compact bundle. The food she had taken from their stores for breakfast he thrust into the pocket of his coat; the rest, with the blankets, she tied swiftly on ! the horse. They unfastened the ani. mal and for a moment she stood holding the reins while Bruce crept back on the hillside to look for the trail. The snow swept round them, and they felt the lowering menace of the cold. And at that instant those dread spirits that rule the wilderness, jealous then and jealous still of the intrusion of man, dealt them a final.

Its weapon was just a sound-a loud crash in a distant thicket—and a their human senses were too blunt to loudly, then reared up. Bruce saw as in a tragic dream the girl struggle to hold him; he saw her pulled down into the snow and the rein jerked from her hand. Then the animal plunged, wheeled and raced at top speed away into the snow flurries. Some terror deadly blow.
