Returning to where they had left their kit, they found six lions in possession. Everything was scattered over the veld and the blankets were being told in threads. The party shouted, sounded the hooter and raced the engine, but were unable to scare the lions off. One of the lions was only a yard or so from all the foodstuffs, and refused to move. One of the men fired several times into the air without result. Then he aimed at a tree beside a big male. As the bullet struck the tree the lion l turned his head to see what it was; otherwise it did not move. After a while the party decided to return to the police picket at Dorspan, where they found a native boy and returned with him to the camp. The lions were still in possession chewing up a suitcase. A petrol flare with a piece of sacking was thrown among the lions. This had the desired effect and they retreated a little way, enabling the tourists to collect a certain amount of their food and remnants of blankets, suitcase, clothing, etc., with an audi-ty yards away. The party returned to Dorspan and spent the night at the police picket. take the place of the old horse-drawn barges on the Grand Union Canal system, which links up the East End of London with Birmingham, says an English newspaper. The motor-boats are now being built, and the canals are being dredged and widened and their embankments strengthened. This scheme involves the disappearance, not only of the picturesque old barges, but also of the sturdy folk who have made them their home for generations, and who have gradually come to form a race apart—the "water gypsies," as one modern nevelist has called them. Under the new scheme, the men who run the motor-boats won't require to live on them, as journers will be much more quickly accomplished. So they will have to and homes for themselves on land. About 500 families, with 1,700 children, now live on barges. A hoating school has recently been provided to facilitate the education of the The new system in line with the
